“ I’ve known Doug since he first moved to town. We weren’t close, but I always admired Doug for his strength and his strong morals. Doug knew what was right, and he knew what needed to be done. He understood the importance of taking care of himself, taking care of his family, and worrying about the rest of the world later. To Doug, family was everything, and they meant the world to him. He understood the importance of sacrifice and when it was necessary. I was having a conversation recently with a mutual friend of ours, and he told me he would not be the person he is today if it weren’t for Doug. I once heard the most important compliments are the ones you never hear. From his friends, acquaintances, and students he coached, I know there are a lot of these for Doug, and he will be dearly missed by many people.
